Executive Summary

A composite analysis is required by U.S. Department of Energy (DOE) Order 435.1 to ensure public safety through the management of active and planned low-level radioactive waste disposal facilities associated with the Hanford Site. The original Hanford Site Composite Analysis of 1998 must be revised and submitted to DOE Headquarters (DOE-HQ) in 2004 because of revisions to waste site information in the 100, 200, and 300 Areas, updated performance assessments and environmental impact statements (EIS), changes in inventory estimates for key sites and constituents, and a change in the definition of offsite receptors.

Beginning in fiscal year (FY) 2003, the DOE Richland Operations Office (DOE-RL) initiated activities, including the development of data packages, to support the 2004 Composite Analysis. This report describes the data compiled in FY 2003 to support ecological site assessment modeling for the 2004 Composite Analysis. This work was conducted as part of the Characterization of Systems Task of the Groundwater Remediation Project (formerly the Groundwater Protection Program) managed by Fluor Hanford, Inc., Richland, Washington.

The purpose of this report is to provide summaries of the characterization information and available spatial data on the biological resources and ecological receptors found in the upland, riparian, aquatic, and island habitats on the Hanford Site. These data constitute the reference information used to establish parameters for the ecological risk assessment module of the System Assessment Capability and other assessment activities requiring information on the presence and distribution of biota on the Hanford Site.

1.0 Introduction

The objective of this report is to provide summaries of the characterization information and available spatial data on the biological resources and ecological receptors found in the upland, riparian, aquatic, and island habitats on the Hanford Site. These data constitute reference information which can be used to support parameters for the ecological risk assessment module of the System Assessment Capability (Bryce et al. 2002) and other assessment activities requiring information on the presence and distribution of biota on the Hanford Site. These data summaries are provided to identify those environments, habitats, or areas for which ecological characterization data are available and pinpoint areas where data are lacking and additional characterization information is needed. Data summarized for this report include data sets collected for the Characterization of Systems Project, the Ecological Monitoring and Compliance (EMC) Project, and the Surface Environmental Surveillance Program (SESP). Also included are available data collected previously on the Hanford Site by private, state, and federal agencies. All data compiled for this report reside in the databases maintained by either the EMC Project or SESP.

Section 2 provides background information concerning the models supported by these data, how the data relate to technical elements of the System Assessment Capability, and how these data are relevant to the composite analysis components. Chapter 3 outlines the data needed to parameterize the numerical models. Chapter 4 describes the data, the databases, and the uncertainty and assumptions about data quality. Chapter 5 describes data gaps and recommendations and Chapter 6 is conclusions. Appendix A provides a summary of the spatial data available for biota on Hanford. Appendix A is organized in tables for upland, riparian, island and aquatic biota, and plant species from the permanent monitoring plots on the Hanford Site. Species included in these tables are those for which spatial information was available. Data in the tables do not include all species found on the site nor do they represent the complete spatial distribution of the species on Hanford. Because these tables are very large, they are included as Excel files with this report. Table A.1 presents information on upland biota, Table A.2 summarizes data for riparian environments, Table A.3 summarizes data for aquatic environments, Table A.4 includes information regarding biota found on the islands of the Hanford Reach, and Table A.5 contains a list of the plant species from the 35 permanent monitoring plots across the Hanford Site. Appendix B contains brief descriptions of field data collection methods.

2.0 Background

Data collected and reported in this document are intended to support ecological characterization and assessment and aid in identifying ecological receptors known or expected to inhabit the riparian, riverine, and upland environments along the Hanford Reach of the Columbia River and within the Hanford Site. Data are summarized for the specific model input requirements and parameter needs for the ecological risk modeling portions of the System Assessment Capability. The basic form of the model used in the System Assessment Capability modeling efforts is the Ecological Contaminant Exposure Model (ECEM) for risk assessment.

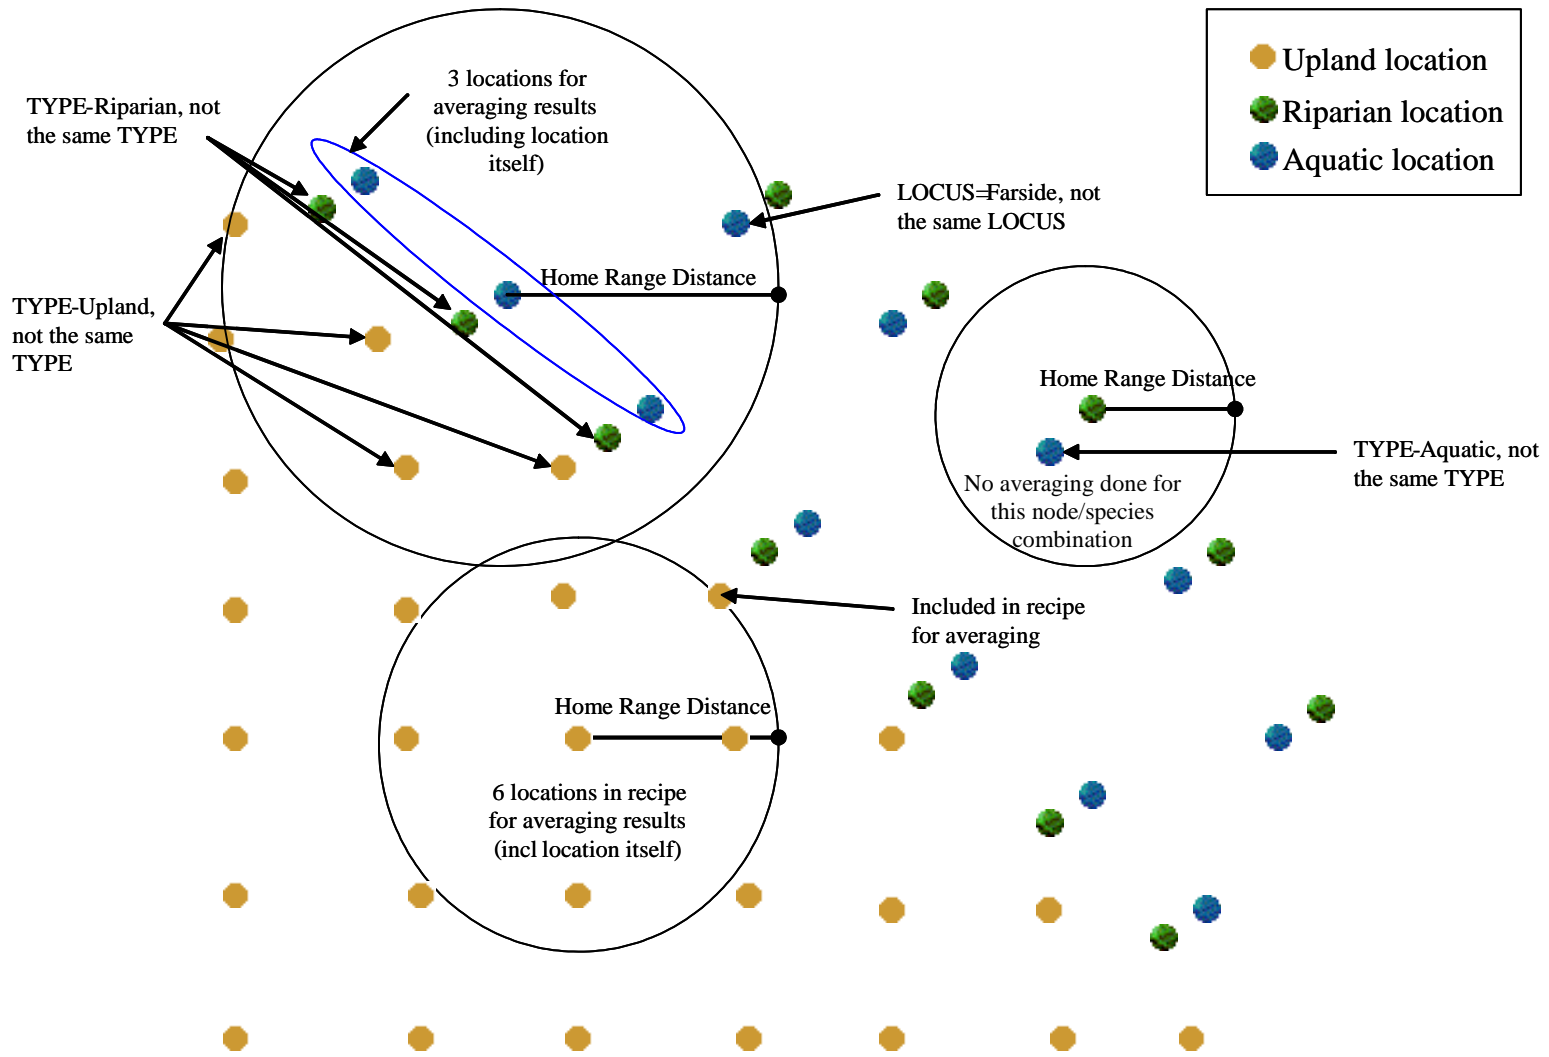

Ecological risk assessments typically consider an organism to receive their entire lifetime dose from one location, a conservative assumption considering that many organisms are mobile and have a region of space that they travel through for food, water, shelter, and other activities. To address this conservatism in the ecological risk module of the System Assessment Capability, a new component called MOBILEHOME was added to the module since the completion of the initial assessment (Bryce et al. 2002). The purpose of MOBILEHOME is to identify the components of the assessment area that an individual ecological receptor would use and composite the organism's exposure across these components. These components comprise an organism's home range, which is defined as the area where an organism lives, eats and reproduces (Calder 1984). For plants such as a mulberry, the home range is essentially a point in space and defined as the location where the plant grows on the Hanford Site. In contrast, the home range of a deer is the region in space where the deer grazes, drinks, and raises its young. Because MOBILEHOME integrates exposure within the home range of an organism (due to spatial variation in contaminant concentrations in the air, soil, and water, the organism's body burden (or contaminant concentration within the organism) also reflects that spatial variation.

The MOBILEHOME routine in the ECEM module requires information on home range for species occurring in three types of locations: aquatic, riparian, and upland. Figure 1 illustrates the different types of nodes where the ECEM model within SAC generates output and how they may be grouped to reflect a species' home range. If a species is identified as inhabiting a location, then exposure is averaged across the nodes within its home range in order to calculate risk. The methods and references for assigning home range and designating receptor species will be addressed in a data package for risk assessment.

3.0 Model Input Parameter Requirements

The data summarized for this effort are intended to support development of the information for the ecological risk assessment by defining whether or not the species of interest occurs at a given location (or model node). The data compiled was used for populating a portion of MOBILEHOME stating the presence or absence of selected receptor species at each location as defined for analysis by the System Assessment Capability. If a species was absent at a location, then the average dose for that location will be zero. If a species was present at a location, then the dose was calculated as an average for its home range.

The data have also been used to define the home ranges for several species at Hanford. For example, Tiller et al. (2000) determined the home range for the elk population on the Hanford Site. This information was used for the elk home range parameter and it was used to define the presence or absence of elk for each location in the System Assessment Capability. The home range parameters and presence/absence data will be addressed in the risk data package.

Site-specific data for Hanford biota were compiled and assessed to assign species characteristics or classifications important to ecological risk assessment. Comprehensive species lists and both measured and estimated location information were used 1) to classify species into functional types and 2) to determine the primary habitats or environments used by each species. Locations were estimated under several situations. These situations included when spatial information was given in coordinates other than Washington State Plane South NAD 83, when general locations, such as island were provided, or when the measurement error in the coordinate located organisms in incompatible habitats (e.g., salmon on land).

Table 1. Biota Functional Types Used for Upland/Riparian and Aquatic Environments

Habitat	Functional Type	Type Code
Upland/Riparian	Mammalian Predator	MP
	Mammalian Herbivore	MH
	Avian Predator	AP
	Avian Herbivores	AH
	Carnivorous Reptiles and Amphibians	CRA
	Terrestrial Invertebrate	TI
Aquatic	Benthic biota	BB
	Fish Herbivore	FH
	Fish Predator	FP

Each animal species was evaluated and assigned a class that reflects its dominant functional type, based primarily on feeding strategies. The functional categories used in this report are presented in Table 1 and are designed to support the Composite Analysis. Additional functional types may be appropriate for other risk assessments and analysis. Functional types can be useful in assessing the potential exposure pathways and biotic transport for ecological receptors. Functional types for terrestrial environments were adapted in part from the Washington Department of Ecology Model Toxic Control Act ecological receptors of concern (WAC 173-340-7493: <http://www.leg.wa.gov/WAC/index.cfm?section=173-340-7493&fuseaction=section> [6/10/2004]). This type of classification and approach was also adapted to classify biota identified from riparian and aquatic environments into functional types. Several sources were used to determine assignment to functional type. Assignment of mammals was based on the diet classification used by the Burke Museum of Natural History and Culture (<http://www.washington.edu/burkemuseum/mammalogy/mamwash/> [9/24/2004]). For bird species, the Seattle Audubon's Online Guide to the Birds of Washington State was used as a guide (<http://www.birdweb.org/birdweb/birds.asp> [9/24/2004]). Assignments were also subject to professional review by PNNL scientists. Species were assigned to a single functional category, although some species may fit in different functional types during different life stages. For example, few bird species are strictly herbivorous, most could be classed as omnivorous during the breeding and brood rearing season. Since age was not always recorded and species may be detected throughout the year, assignment of functional type was based on the predominant species characteristics for adult life stages.

Each species was also classified as residing in one or more of the four general habitat types (i.e., upland, riparian, river or island) used for the System Assessment Capability composite analysis. The classification is based on expected and/or potential use of the habitat. Habitat use was defined to include the primary areas on the Hanford Site where the organism resides and/or reproduces. A number of species may forage across several habitat types.

(1) Species listed in this table are from the following sources: locational data from EMC and SESP Project databases; TNC (Soll et al. 1999; Evans et al. 2003); Fitzner and Gray 1991; Hanford Site NEPA Characterization (Neitzel 2003); a working list of species developed by BL Tiller under EMC Project.

The species in Appendix A were collected by many different studies with different objectives (Appendix B), therefore the list does not include all species found on the Hanford Site, nor, for the species included, does it accurately represent the complete extent of their distribution or period of residence on the Site. The only site-wide survey completed to date has been the vegetation mapping. Using data from that vegetation mapping effort and information about an animal species, it was possible to extrapolate probable habitats for potential receptor species found on the Site. Table 2 contains the results of this extrapolation for species found in Appendix A with the addition of species known to occur on Site but not present in the Appendix. Species in Table 2 include mammals, birds, reptiles, amphibians, fish, crustacean, and mollusks. Insect species are not included at this level of detail. The Hanford Site has a rich and diverse fauna (Evans et al. 2003) containing the common receptor species: ants, beetles, spiders, scorpions, mayflies (aquatic and terrestrial), and caddisflies (aquatic and terrestrial). The diversity of species ensures that insects are represented in all habitats across the Hanford Site.

4.0 Data Gathering Methods

This chapter describes the data, databases, uncertainty, and assumptions about data quality. It describes and summarizes ecological data sets available for the Hanford Site that are most appropriate for evaluating ecological receptors. The ecological characterization data for Hanford summarized in this document and files provided in the data package are a synthesis of data collected over a number of years (up to and including 2003) and through a number of different projects on the Hanford Site. Some of the data were collected as part of routine monitoring programs; some data were collected during special efforts to provide biological inventory and mapping of the resources at Hanford; other data were collected to support study of specific species of concern to the public and the Hanford community; and some data sets were collected to provide site-specific ecological information in support of cleanup activities. These data have been compiled, subjected to a preliminary review for consistency and relative accuracy, and included in the data package as feasible. As such, the methods for collecting, processing, and reporting these data vary according to the objectives of each study and/or project. More detailed information for each data set is included in Section 4.1 and Appendix B. In most cases, the data sets described in this document are archived in databases maintained as part of the EMC Project and SESP.

EMC Project. The EMC Project is managed as part of the Public Safety and Resource Protection Program (PSRPP) by Pacific Northwest National Laboratory (PNNL) to monitor the biological resources of the Hanford Site in support of the U.S. Department of Energy (DOE). The EMC Project monitors and evaluates how biota are affected by changes from such diverse sources as fire, cleanup activities that disturb existing communities, and the potential ecological risk from contaminants. Project objectives include characterizing and assessing the impact to biological resources from Hanford operations and legacy contaminants in the environment, conducting, and documenting ecological compliance reviews for all Hanford-related cleanup and operations activities, and identifying biotic contaminant transport pathways to characterize ecological risks.

The EMC Project database includes both compliance-specific project information and monitoring data. These data capture a major portion of the information available concerning both historical and current conditions of the biological resources found at Hanford. The compliance data sets include data collected during annual baseline field surveys of all operable units on the Hanford Site and data from project-specific ecological compliance reviews conducted for all federal projects that have the potential to impact the biological environment. The annual baseline surveys of species and habitats in the vicinity of the Hanford Site industrial areas are used to identify and update the inventory of resources of concern for compliance of Hanford operations with environmental regulations. Compliance reviews include a brief description of the proposed action as it pertains to the biological environment, a complete description of the species and habitats that will be affected, an analysis of the significance of the impacts, and identification of mitigation needs.

Monitoring data include data sets collected to inventory and characterize populations and species and their distribution across Hanford. Examples of populations and species for which data are or have been collected include large mammals such as deer, elk, and coyotes; small mammals such as pocket mice and deer mice; passerine birds in a variety of habitats; buteo hawks and eagles; reptiles and amphibians; plant communities and species; and fishes including salmonids. The EMC Project maintains long-term, permanent monitoring plots to evaluate the structure and functioning of existing plant and animal communities with respect to the distribution of habitats and contaminants in the environment (Dirkes and Hanf 1997). The project also maintains specific data sets to describe the status of biota of public interest including species federally listed as threatened and/or endangered by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and those state-listed species identified by the Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife or the Washington Natural Heritage Program; these include bald eagles, salmon, and rare plant populations.

SESP. PNNL also manages the SESP (part of the PSRPP), an ongoing, multi-media environmental monitoring project to evaluate the concentrations of organic, inorganic and radionuclide contaminants in the environment at Hanford, and assess the integrated effects of these contaminants on the environment and public. PNNL annually monitors hundreds of sampling sites across Hanford and the surrounding areas as part of SESP. The media sampled by SESP includes air, surface water, river sediments, drinking water, agricultural products, fish and wildlife, soil and vegetation, external radiation levels, and groundwater. Monitoring results are used to assess the fate, transport, exposure, and associated risk of radionuclides and hazardous chemicals to the public and environment. Results of SESP monitoring are maintained in the Hanford Environmental Information System (HEIS). The pertinent data describing locations of wildlife and fish species sampled are included in this document.

4.1 Data Sources

The data included in this report were taken from the following sources:

Characterization of Systems (COS). As part of efforts funded by the COS project under the Groundwater Remediation Program, PNNL staff conducted surveys and sampling of biota during fiscal years (FY) 2001, 2002, and 2003 to provide additional ecological characterization data and address the largest gaps in information for riparian and riverine habitats. During FY 2003, PNNL also worked to procure and examine existing data on the biota and habitats along the Hanford Reach within the riparian zone and provide a synthesis of the information. Data collected as part of the characterization efforts included: avian surveys of the riparian zone, the extent and distribution of small mammals in riparian habitats, and the demographics and distributions of Asiatic clams, crayfish, and sculpin populations inhabiting the near-shore areas of the Hanford Reach. Location information for these species and associated habitats are presented in Appendix A. Collection protocols for these data are described in the EMC data procedures in Appendix B. These data are archived in the EMC database.

EMC Database. The database contains data for a variety of biota and habitats including Chinook salmon redds, Canada geese nesting, mule deer, elk, bald eagles, and other avian species as well as documented populations of plant species of concern and critical habitat areas. Depending on the species and the sampling context, spatial data may be available. Long-term monitoring datasets are available for the following populations:

- Chinook salmon redds have been estimated by aerial surveys since the 1940s. The majority of redds occur near Locke Island and between the Columbia River miles 365-368, and Vernita Bar. The spatial attributes associated with this data are general in nature and the data were therefore not included in this report.
- Canada goose nests have been surveyed on islands in the Hanford Reach beginning in 1953 and were conducted annually until 1995 and biannually until 2001. Spatial information was collected at goose nesting locations for 1999 and 2001; these data are included in Table A.4 in Appendix A.
- Location data for mule deer are available for 1994 through 2000, elk locations for 1990-1994 and 2000-2002, bald eagle locations for 1990-2001, and the locations of raptor nests are available for 1990-1994, 1998 and 2000-2001.
- Roadside surveys documenting avian species were initiated in 1988 and counts made at known locations. Selected roadside surveys have been continued through 2004.
- Surveyed locations and counts of Columbia yellowcress along the Hanford Reach for 1993-1995 and 1998-2001.

Also vegetation and wildlife data have been collected as baseline information for a number of long-term monitoring sites located across the Hanford Site. Vegetation, small mammals, birds, herpetofauna (frogs, lizards, turtles, and snakes), and invertebrates have been and continue to be surveyed at selected sites. Baseline data collected as part of long-term monitoring are included in Appendix A.

Other data available through the EMC database include characterization of existing vegetation found on the operable units across the site, locations of rare plants, and spatial data layers that delineate the vegetation/land cover types on Hanford (see Section 4.2).

SESP Database. Data collected under SESP from 1999-2003 for wildlife and plants sampled on Hanford are included in Appendix A. Coordinates and location information for samples collected from 1999 to 2003 have been checked for accuracy. Coordinates recorded for samples collected before 1999 have some uncertainty associated with the technology and locations, and so data collected before 1999 were not included in this compilation.

Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife Salmon Stranding Program. A salmon stranding study was conducted by Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife between 1998 and 2002 (Nugent et al. 2002). Entrapment areas along the Columbia River were identified and surveyed for fish, according to the salmon stranding protocol (Nugent et al. 2002). In addition, at each entrapment location, the presence of anurans was noted anecdotally. WDFW data are included in Appendix A and are archived in the EMC database.

The Nature Conservancy (TNC) Biological Inventory. In 1992, DOE and The Nature Conservancy of Washington entered into a Memorandum of Understanding that called for a cooperative and coordinated inventory of plants, animals, and ecologically significant areas at the Hanford Site. The goal of the inventory was to identify and map occurrences of native plant communities, rare plant populations, and important animal taxa over large areas of the Hanford Site (Soll et al. 1999; Evans et al. 2003). The Nature Conservancy of Washington collected data on plant communities, rare plants, noxious weeds, small mammals, birds, insects (aquatic and terrestrial), amphibians and reptiles, and on mosses and lichens (the microbiotic crust). The Nature Conservancy of Washington data for amphibians and reptiles, small mammals, birds, and insects are archived in the EMC database. Data from The Nature Conservancy of Washington are included in Tables A.1 and A.2.

Biological Resources and Uptake of Contaminants at the 300-FF-5 Operable Unit. In 1992, PNNL evaluated the biological resources of the 300-FF-5 (groundwater) Operable Unit and uptake of 300-FF5 contaminants to support analyses of potential risk from operable unit contaminants to humans and the ecological community (Brandt et al. 1993). The objectives of PNNL's biological resource evaluation were to document the habitats and species that occurred or may be expected to occur on the operable unit; identify key ecosystem components, protected species, and contaminant transfer pathways as they relate to human health and ecological impacts; and represent sufficient information from a literature review on the biology of the key organisms to support human health and the ecological risk assessments. PNNL undertook field surveys to evaluate plant species occurrences, bird abundance, and mammalian species composition in the operable unit and in a similar habitat immediately upriver of the operable unit. Mammalian species composition and bird data are available and has been summarized in Table A.2. The mammal and bird data collected in this study reside in the EMC database.

Survey of Radiological and Chemical Contaminants in the Near-Shore Environment at the Hanford Site 300 Area. In 2001, PNNL and the Washington State Department of Health assessed the near-shore of the Columbia River at the 300 Area of the Hanford Site (Patton et al. 2003). The objective of the assessment was to determine levels of contamination in abiotic and biotic components of the near-shore. Biotic components sampled for this assessment included: small mammals, such as deer and house mouse; insects, such as adult mayflies and darkling beetles; prickly sculpin; crayfish; Asian clams; and both riparian and aquatic vegetation. White sweet clover and mulberry trees were sampled for the riparian vegetative component, while the aquatic vegetation was primarily spike water milfoil. Available spatial data for small mammals are stored in the SESP database.

100-B/C Area Ecological Risk Assessment Sampling and Analysis Plan. As cleanup activities near completion in the 100 Area of the Hanford Site, the effectiveness of the remedial actions is being evaluated. A sampling and analysis plan was completed in early 2003 (DOE 2003), and PNNL has begun the process of sampling biota in the upland, riparian, and near-shore environments for contaminant concentrations. Data are currently available for small mammal trapping results (SESP and EMC database).

4.2 Data Compilation

Data from the above listed activities and project sources were compiled and species were assigned to one or more of the four general habitat types (i.e., upland, riparian, river or island) based on expected and/or potential use of the habitat. Use of habitat was defined as the primary areas where the organism resides and/or reproduces. The data tables are included in an Excel file for Appendix A. Tables A.1 through A.4 contain individual records for each species located in upland, riparian, river and island habitats, respectively. Each individual record includes location information (coordinates are Washington State Plane, South, NAD83, meters), last date surveyed, and the number of occurrences at that location. The count data were included to provide a relative indication of how common an organism was at a particular location. Care must be taken in interpreting the count information since all organisms were not sampled at each location, and there is no measure of sample effort. Finally, species data were associated with the vegetation cover types from before and after the 2000 wildfire. Table A.5 lists plant species observed within 35 permanent monitoring plots on the Hanford Site.

The first four tables in Appendix A represent over 11,000 individual occurrences of animal species at specific locations within the four habitat types. Locational information for all animal species, except birds, reflects habitats where the animals were captured or observed. In bird surveys, location information is generally the location of the observer, not the bird. This could lead to confusion in assigning habitats for bird species; for example, waterfowl identified on a shoreline survey would appear to occur in riparian habitat rather than riverine. Also birds flying over an observer would be assigned to the habitat of the observer resulting in records showing mallards in upland habitats.

Descriptions of the data collection procedures are presented in Appendix B, and in Brandt et al. (1993) for the 300-FF-5 study, Patton et al. (2003) for a study of the 300 Area, Soll et al. (1999), Downs and Tiller (2004), and Hanf and Poston (2000).

4.3 Spatial Data Layers

Much of the data available in the SESP and EMC databases pertain to the occurrence of specific species. However, the distribution and abundance of organisms in the environment is closely related to the available habitat for the species. Species-specific habitats can be identified by the biotic and abiotic conditions of the environment. Biotic conditions include the types of vegetation present and the faunal species assemblages; whereas abiotic conditions include characteristics such as topography, soil, elevation, temperature and precipitation in terrestrial communities or water temperatures, flow velocities, substrates and channel morphology in aquatic communities.

Spatial delineations of habitat (both biotic and abiotic) can be used as a first step to identify potential locations and home ranges for species. Maps of the type of vegetation cover provide information on the amount of cover available for fauna, the available vegetative food sources, and insight into species assemblages. For particular species, other characteristics such as substrate and river channel dynamics may be equally important. For example, the distribution of certain riparian entities (e.g., amphibians, shore birds) is likely to be correlated with substrate type along the shoreline.

The spatial layers that can be used to delineate upland habitats associated with particular species are described in detail by Downs et al. (1993) and by Sackschewsky and Downs (2001) as well as in Hanford Site National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) Characterization (Neitzel 2003). Riparian habitats and physical descriptions of riverine habitat conditions are described by Downs and Tiller (2004) and in the Hanford Site Environmental Report for Calendar Year 2003 (in press). Each of these environmental strata are archived and used as geographic information system (GIS) data within the EMC databases.

Spatial habitat layers are available for the following habitats and are archived in the EMC databases:

Upland Vegetation Layers. The terrestrial upland habitat is described by two vegetation layers: Pre- and Post-24 Command Fire spatial vegetation layers. The 2000 fire destroyed shrub habitat on a significant portion of Hanford, so the map layer delineating upland vegetation cover types was updated to reflect major changes in the vegetation resulting from the fire. The map classes identify the dominant plant species (usually dominant shrub/dominant grass or primary grass/secondary grass) associations found across the Hanford Site. Information on the vegetation cover types, and the relationship between soils and plant cover types was described by Sackschewsky and Downs (2001).

Riparian Spatial Vegetation Layers. During FY 2001 and FY 2002, PNNL initiated work to provide a complete spatial data coverage delineating the major riparian vegetation cover types and plant associations found along the Hanford shoreline. Data gaps remain along the Franklin and Grant County shoreline where the riparian vegetation band is relatively narrow or where shoreline lands were previously managed by the Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife.

In addition to the types of vegetation regarded as riparian, areas exist along the shoreline and on the islands within the Hanford Reach where little or no riparian vegetation is present and other vegetation types are dominant. For example, on the islands and where gravel bars have formed in the Columbia River, the central portion of the bar or island may lie well above the highest river flows. These areas often support vegetation types commonly existing in drier habitats away from the river's influence. Upland communities falling within the extent of the riparian zone are identified and included in the riparian spatial layer.

Aquatic Spatial Habitat Layers. Because the geomorphology of the Columbia River controls a number of physical conditions, such as velocity and substrate condition, relationships may exist between geomorphic characteristics and assemblages of organisms found in the river. For the river system, the aquatic environment was partitioned into segments of the river based on the shape of the river channel. These river segments were based on original bathymetric studies conducted by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers during the 1980's to assess the feasibility of constructing a dam within the Hanford Reach. Cross-sectional bathymetric transects were spaced 200 to 700 meters throughout the Hanford Reach, and each river segment consists of the area between two adjacent transects. Each segment was classified by two primary criteria: planform and geomorphology, based on the shape of the river channel. The planform and geomorphology information were used to separate or stratify the Hanford Reach of the Columbia River into channel classifications.

The substrate type (sediment, sand, gravel, to large boulders) likely plays a large role in the distribution of both riparian (shorebirds and amphibians) and aquatic organisms (e.g., bivalves, fishes) along the Columbia River. A geospatial vector coverage of dominant and subdominant substrates in the Columbia River between McNary to Priest Rapids Dam, including the Snake River to Ice Harbor Dam, was created by USGS. Spatial distribution of substrate was estimated from point and transect sampling conducted between 1995 and 1998 using both an underwater camera and scoop samples from the river bottom. Polygons were hand-drawn at 1:20,000 scale, then digitized as an ARC/INFO vector coverage. Each polygon is assumed to be homogeneous with respect to one dominant and one sub-dominant substrate.

In 2002, a more detailed spatial coverage of the near-shore substrate was made by PNNL. The near-shore area is defined as the section of the shoreline that is inundated 95 to 99% of the time; the upper boundary is usually identified by a darkened line. The mapped area extended along the Benton County side of the Columbia River from Vernita Bridge downstream to the 300 Area. Substrate was mapped at points every 50 to 100 meters along the shoreline or where there was a noticeable change in substrate. Each point was classified by the primary and secondary rock substrate and the relative amounts of silt and clam shells.

5.0 Parameter Uncertainties/Data Gaps/Technical Issues and Recommendations

The data summarized for this report includes species location information that will be used to determine the presence or absence of biota in upland, riparian, island and aquatic environments. Data were compiled from both SESP and EMC databases. The parameters included in the data tables in Appendix A contain each individual species record, location information, last date recorded, and the number seen over the course of the surveys. In addition, species data were related to biotic and abiotic spatial data layers and all species were classified into functional types. The data generated for this report does not include information regarding abundance, health of organisms, or fidelity.

As with any compilation of data from various investigations, there may be some uncertainties regarding the quality and consistency of the data. The data compiled for this report were collected under various projects with differing objectives over a number of years, and the methods used to collect the data were often not consistent between studies. There was a wide-ranging level of detail in the location information, and the methods used to collect location information were not standardized. In addition, the quality of species identification directly relates to the training of the observer. These data were compiled from several agencies and programs with different observers. Every effort was made to include all available data and approximately 11,000 data records have been compiled in this effort. There are, however, existing data gaps which include:

- Data stored in laboratory record books (LRBs) that are not part of any existing database
- Specific location information for many long-term monitoring datasets
- Data presented in historical literature
- Surveys conducted by other site contractors, such as Bechtel Hanford, Inc.
- Data collected by students and universities
- Specific species data for all species included in the ECEM model. This includes presence/absence data for all vegetation communities and environment types (e.g., islands).
- While some spatial data are available for benthic invertebrates, there exists no comprehensive listing of all the macro- and micro-invertebrates expected to inhabit the Hanford Site.

In addition, because this data compilation synthesizes a number of studies done over the past decade, it is important for users to understand that the sampling, analysis, and information contained in this report represent current (2003) and past conditions. Organisms, habitats, and communities are not static and can change dramatically over very short time periods for any number of reasons such as fire, ground disturbance, or extreme weather events or cycles. Some spatial data sets in the data package represent a relatively complete set of information describing presence/absence of species. However, many data sets represent only a sample or survey of species occurrence for particular areas. Thus, the data listed in Appendix A tables must be carefully evaluated before use in determining presence/absence. Many sample and survey efforts are not designed to document absence of species.

6.0 Conclusions

This data package contains available spatial information concerning the habitats and organisms that currently (2003) occupy or have recently occupied the Hanford Site. These data can be used to define the spatial distribution of biological resources on the site and identify the potential ecological receptors likely to be present in the different habitats/communities that exist at Hanford. Data included in Appendix A of this report are archived through the EMC databases for use by the U.S. Department of Energy and their contractors.

Data Tables

Appendix A

Data Tables

This appendix is contained in an Excel file included with this report. Tables A.1 through A.4 contain individual records for each species located in upland, riparian, aquatic and island habitats, respectively. Each table contains the common name, scientific name, functional type, last date sampled, number counted when available, location (northing and easting in Washington State Plane South, NAD 83, meters), and the pre- and post-fire vegetation community at that location. Table A.5 contains information on plant species found on 35 permanent plots on the Hanford Site. Information includes: common name, scientific name, location (northing and easting in Washington State Plane South, NAD 83, meters), permanent plot and subplot labels, and pre- and post-fire vegetation community designations. A comprehensive listing of plant species on the Hanford Site can be found in “Vascular Plants of the Hanford Site” (Sackschewsky and Downs 2001), including approximate locations and general collection information.

B.1 EMC Rare Plant Distributions

Objective. Surveys and mapping efforts have documented the occurrence and extent of rare plant populations and plant community types on the Hanford Site for the past 15 years (Downs et al. 1993; Soll et al. 1999; Poston et al. 2003). These efforts are documented as a spatial data layer in ARC-GIS in the Ecological Monitoring and Compliance (EMC) Project database. Attribute tables for this data layer identify the species, surveyor, and date of survey. Populations of rare plants include taxa listed by Washington State as endangered, threatened, or sensitive and the locations of species that are listed as review group 1 (i.e., taxa in need of additional field work before status can be determined) (Washington Natural Heritage Program 1997). Data are collected for plant populations and plant communities to develop baseline information and to monitor changes resulting from Hanford operations. More than 100 populations of 47 species of rare plants are located on the Hanford Site.

Methods. Field surveys are accomplished by pedestrian searches in known and likely habitats. All current survey locations are recorded as coordinates in Washington State plane south using global positioning systems. Data received from The Nature Conservancy recorded as township, range, and section were reviewed and point locations were estimated using topographic maps. These points are buffered to include immediately adjacent habitat.

B.2 EMC Vegetation Mapping

Objective. Knowledge of the distribution and extent of the variety of vegetation cover types, plant communities, or plant associations found on the Hanford Site is needed for a number of land management and site operation purposes. There are currently three vegetation cover maps that may provide useful information for risk assessment purposes: 1) a map of the types of upland vegetation cover present on the site before the 2000 wildfire (24-Command Fire); 2) an update to the types of upland vegetation cover to reflect changes after the 2000 wildfire, which burned approximately 160,000 acres; and 3) a map of the types of riparian vegetation cover found along the Hanford Reach. These are archived as ARC-GIS spatial data layers in the EMC database.

Methods. Pre-2000-Fire Upland Vegetation: This data set describes the upland vegetation on the Hanford Site prior to the 2000 wildfire. This coverage is a composition of mapping conducted by PNNL staff in 1992 and 1993, data collected by The Nature Conservancy in 1994 and 1995, and data collected by Salstrom and Easterly Ecologic in 1997 for The Nature Conservancy. The North Slope, Wahluke, and the Fitzner Eberhardt Arid Lands Ecology Reserve were mapped by The Nature Conservancy in 1995. The remaining portion (central Hanford) was updated based on PNNL maps and a ground survey completed by Salstrom and Easterly Ecologic in 1997.

Post-2000-Fire Upland Vegetation Map: This coverage reflects updates and modifications made to the pre-2000-fire vegetation map using SPOT satellite imagery acquired immediately after the fire and field survey and observations. These data reflect the vegetation existing after the June 2000 fire.

Riparian Vegetation Map: Mapping data collected by TNC during inventory work in the 1990s was acquired and digitized (Downs et al. 2004a). Although a large portion of the riparian vegetation was mapped by The Nature Conservancy, those areas where the riparian vegetation band is very narrow were not included in the original map data received from The Nature Conservancy and in some cases, riparian vegetation adjacent to reactor areas was not included. PNNL efforts during FY 2002, FY 2003, and FY 2004 focused on acquiring and synthesizing the data and information to provide a more complete spatial data coverage for the Benton County side of the Hanford Reach and the major islands within the Hanford Reach. Field surveys were conducted using aerial photography collected in 2002 to complete the mapping effort and provide data to better characterize the extent and composition of the vegetation types found along the Benton County side of the Hanford Reach shoreline (Downs et al. 2004b).

B.3 EMC Avian Surveys

Objective. Bird surveys have focused on determining the relative abundance and distribution of birds on the Hanford Site. These surveys are conducted across various habitats on the site and involve both roadside driving surveys as well as walking surveys. Several surveys have had more specific objectives including the brown-headed cowbird survey in 2000, which provided abundance and distribution estimates of cowbirds at Hanford facilities. Bird surveys are also conducted on the long-term monitoring plots (Vander Hagen et al. 2000)

Methods. Spring and summer roadside surveys follow the general procedures for the North American Breeding Bird Surveys (USGS, <http://www.mp2-pwrc.usgs.gov/bbs/>) where all birds seen or heard are counted for 3 minutes at predetermined and marked stops along a road. During the winter, birds are counted while driving slowly between these stops. Roadside surveys began in 1988 with two, 25-mile transects on the Fitzner-Eberhardt Arid Lands Ecology Reserve (ALE) and two, 25-mile transects on central Hanford (Hanford). Additional shorter transects were added in 1995 at the old Hanford town site. In 2002, all surveys on ALE were suspended, and additional roadside survey routes were added on central Hanford.

Walking surveys are conducted in various habitats to document bird usage. Bird counts are taken either as the observer walks slowly along a marked transect or at known locations. Birds were counted at Snively (1991-2001) and Rattlesnake (1996-2001) springs, while walking along edge of the riparian vegetation. Only birds using the site were counted; flybys were not included. Walking surveys are also used to determine bird usage at the long-term monitoring plots established across the Hanford Site.

Point count surveys include riparian surveys for the Characterization of Systems (2003), brown-headed cowbird surveys of Hanford operable units (2000), winter waterfowl surveys (2002), winter birds adjacent to reactor areas (1998-2001), riparian breeding birds (2003), and annual bird surveys of operable units (1994-present). For point count surveys, the observer stops at pre-selected and marked locations and counts all birds seen or heard over a set time period, usually 10 minutes.

Transects were selected to cover the major habitat features of the Hanford Site: shrub-steppe, burned shrub-steppe, old agricultural fields, riparian, old residential neighborhoods containing trees, and operable units. Additional details are documented in the EMC database.

B.4 EMC Avian Nesting Surveys

Objective. Surveys of nest locations and nesting success have been used to determine the reproductive performance of several bird species on the Hanford Site. Nesting surveys have been conducted for buteo hawks, Canada geese, and birds nesting on Hanford buildings. Buteo hawks nesting on the site include ferruginous red-tailed, and Swainson's hawk. The ferruginous hawk is a Washington State threatened species as well as a U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service candidate species for listing as threatened or endangered (50 CFR 17.11). Lack of public access and development on Hanford has resulted in a level of protection for nesting habits. Approximately one quarter of the ferruginous hawk nests in the state occur on Hanford, and nesting surveys provide an index of the health of the species.

Before 1948, few Canada geese nested along the Hanford Reach of the Columbia River. With the establishment of the Hanford Site and the resulting protection of the islands, by 2001 there were over 200 nests. These species are assessed for potential contaminate exposure resulting from historical site operations.

Nesting on Hanford buildings are monitored to document which birds nest among the buildings and identify potential exposure pathways.

Methods. Buteo hawk nests have been located using a combination of aerial, vehicular, and walking surveys. An extensive search in 1991 and 1992, documented the preferred nesting areas for the three species (Nugent 1995). Surveys are conducted from mid-May to mid-July when all three species occupy nesting territories. Since 1993, nesting surveys have been limited to known nest locations. Additional methods are available in the EMC database

Surveys of nesting Canada geese were conducted from March through April or May. All islands within the Hanford Reach were searched for nests. Once a nest was located it was flagged or otherwise identified. Nests were revisited several times over the nesting season to document nesting success and determine the reason for nesting and egg failures. Prior to 1999, nests were only identified by island. In 1999 and 2001, coordinates were taken for each nest. Coordinates were in State Plane WA South, NAD 83, meters, FIPS zone 4602. Additional methods are available in the EMC database and in Hanson and Eberhardt (1971), Fitzner and Rickard (1983), and Fitzner et al. (1993).

Surveys of the Hanford buildings for nesting birds are undertaken annually between April and June. A walking survey is conducted around all buildings and the species nesting is determined.

B.5 EMC Wintering Bald Eagles

Objective. The bald eagle is listed as a federally threatened species (50 CFR 17.11) and also a Washington State threatened species (Washington State Department of Wildlife 1994). Wintering and nesting bald eagles on the Hanford Site are managed according to the Hanford Site bald eagle management plan (DOE 1994). On the Hanford Reach of the Columbia River, eagles winter and could potentially nest in areas near remediation areas on the Hanford Site. To manage and protect these birds, annual surveys are conducted to determine the number of birds using the site and document any nesting activity.

Methods. Surveys started in 1961 as part of U.S. Fish and Wildlife Wintering Waterfowl Survey and have continued as part of the EMC Project. Surveys prior to 1992 were done from an airplane; recent surveys are from a boat. The historical survey data for wintering bald eagles generally included either a specific location, such as the Hanford town site, or an area such as Hanford town site to 100-F Area. These area designations were not consistent over the years of the survey. In 1997, the survey area along the Hanford Reach was divided into 10 sections such that data since 1997 assigns birds to known areas of the Hanford Reach. Additional documentation is available in the EMC database.

B.6 EMC Elk Monitoring

Objective. Since elk appeared on the Hanford Site in the early 1970s, their numbers have risen from less than 10 to over 800 animals in the late 1990s. The elk herd has been monitored to study population dynamics and determine their distribution.

Methods. The elk population on Hanford has been monitored using a combination of radiotelemetry and visual sightings. Radio-collared elk have been located over 2,500 times using either fixed-wing aircraft or mobile ground-tracking. Detailed methods are in McCorquodale et al. (1986), Eberhardt et al. (1989), Tiller et al. (2000), and in the EMC database.

B.7 EMC Deer Population Monitoring

Objective. Surveys are conducted to monitor mule deer sex ratios, age trends, and relative abundance on the Hanford Site (Poston et al. 2002). Deer occur throughout the site and are monitored for potential contaminate exposure resulting from historical site operations

Methods. Deer surveys have been conducted annually since 1993. Specified routes through the Hanford Site are surveyed during late fall and early winter. Deer are counted and their relative health assessed to determine sex ratios, age trends, and relative abundance. Information from these surveys is also used to assess the prevalence of gonadal atrophy in the mule deer population (Tiller et al. 1997). Deer are also collected for contaminant analysis as part of the SESP project (Tiller et al. 1995; Tiller and Poston 2000; Poston et al. 2002). Detailed methods are available in the EMC database.

B.8 EMC Herpetofauna (amphibians and reptiles) Distribution

Objective. The Hanford Site and especially the Columbia River shoreline provide various types of habitat for amphibians and reptiles. The distribution of reptiles has been documented at the long-term monitoring plots. In 2003, an effort was made to identify potential habitat and distribution of amphibians along the Columbia River.

Methods. On the long-term monitoring plots, pitfall traps are placed along trap lines in selected plant communities to monitor the distribution of amphibians and reptiles other than snakes. The number of traps and distribution is dependent on the plant community. Detailed procedures are available in the EMC database.

In 2003, aerial flights over the Columbia River shoreline were used to identify potential amphibian breeding sites. Visual and call surveys were conducted at 15 pools. Detailed procedures are in Downs and Tiller (2004).

B.9 EMC Small Mammal Distribution

Objective. Small mammal trapping is conducted in selected habitats at many locations across the Hanford Site to determine the distribution and abundance of small, burrowing mammals. Because these animals are a prey species and have burrowing habits, they are important ecological receptors for evaluating the fate of potential Hanford-related contaminants. Surveys were conducted as part of site-wide long-term monitoring and the Characterization of Systems project (Downs and Tiller 2004).

Methods. Small mammal trapping is conducted by placing trap lines in selected plant communities, with the type of trap, number of trap lines, number of traps per line, line spacing, and trap spacing unique to each vegetation community to maintain the same trapping effort and, therefore, comparability of results between the areas of concern and reference locations. Location information is taken at all trap lines.

In addition to Sherman live traps, pitfall traps (30-centimeters deep) are systematically placed along the trap line. Pitfalls are used to capture small mammals (such as shrews) that occur only in riparian communities and that might not otherwise frequent Sherman traps. Pitfall traps may also capture amphibians, small reptiles, and invertebrates. (Note that pitfall traps exclude larger reptiles such as snakes.) Detailed procedures are available in the EMC database.

B.10 EMC Ichthyofauna (salmon and other fish) Distribution

Objective. The objective of the data collection is to characterize the fish communities present within areas potentially impacted by Hanford Site operations. Data collected was used to assess seasonal and long-term changes in such community attributes as species richness, abundance, and catch per unit effort (CPUE). Fish are also collected to assess their condition compared to a control location. Some of the surveys were part of the Characterization of Systems projects (Downs and Tiller 2004).

Methods. Fish are collected either with beach seines or after stunning the fish by electrofishing . All fish are identified by species.

B.11 EMC Benthic Biota

Objective. Assessment of the potential impact to biotic receptors in riverine habitats from Hanford-derived contaminants requires information on the distribution and abundance of biota in potential exposure areas. An assessment of available ecological data in 2001 revealed data gaps specifically with the benthic community (Downs and Tiller 2004). In response, sampling was initiated in 2002 and 2003 to evaluate the demographics and distributions of the populations of Asiatic clams, crayfish, and sculpin inhabiting the Hanford shoreline. This data was also used for the Characterization of Systems.

Methods. Sample locations were established in the near-shore habitats at U.S. Geological Survey transects that were inundated at least 99% of the time. At each location, coordinates were taken and counts were made of clams, crayfish, and sculpin. Some organisms were collected for radiological, chemical, and histological analysis. Detailed sample and collection methods are documented in EMC database.

B.12. EMC Mapping of Macrophyte Areas Along the Hanford Reach (2002)

Objective. Potential biotic receptors in riverine habitats from Hanford-derived contaminants include the macrophyte community along the Columbia River shoreline. Data was collected in 2002 to map the extent and distribution of the macrophyte communities along the south/west shore of the Hanford Reach.

Methods. Macrophyte areas were located and locations were recorded using a GPS in one of three ways: 1) points were taken around the entire area (polygon), 2) a line was taken through the center of a strip, or 3) a point was taken at the center of a small clump of macrophytes. A video picture was taken of each site and the date, time, and primary and secondary substrate class were recorded. Detailed methods are available in the EMC database.

B.13 Surface Environmental Surveillance Project Monitoring (SESP)

Objective. Environmental surveillance of the Hanford Site and the surrounding region is conducted annually to demonstrate compliance with environmental regulations, confirm adherence to DOE environmental policies, support DOE environmental management decisions, and provide information to the public (Dirkes and Hanf 1998).

Methods. Fish and wildlife inhabiting the Columbia River and the Hanford Site are collected for analysis on a rotating schedule, with all segments analyzed over a 3-year period (Poston et al. 2003). A variety of species are collected including salmon, sculpin, Canada geese, pheasants, mollusks, aquatic invertebrates, mule deer, cottontail rabbits, and aquatic and riparian vegetation. For each species sampled, radionuclides are selected for analysis based on the potential for the contaminant to be found at the sample site and to accumulate in the organism. More detailed collection and analysis procedures are in the annual Hanford Site Environmental reports (Poston et al. 2003).

B.14 Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife Fish Stranding Study (1998-2002)

Objective. The purpose of this study was to assess the effects of stranding, due to fluctuating river flow, on emigrating salmon.

Methods. Entrapments, pools of water determined by Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife not to drain within 48 hours after becoming disconnected from the river, were sampled for fish according to salmon stranding protocol (Hoffarth et al. 2001). The presence of all fish species was noted and spatial data was recorded for each entrapment site. Detailed procedures are available in Nugent et al. (2002) and Hoffarth et al. (2001).

B.15 The Nature Conservancy Biodiversity Studies of the Hanford Site (1994 – present)

Objective. A primary objective of the surveys by The Nature Conservancy (under a grant from the U.S. Department of Energy, DE-FG06-94RL12858) is to conduct an inventory of the biological diversity of the Hanford Site and, when possible, determine habitat requirements. Species surveyed by The Nature Conservancy have included birds, bats, small mammals, insects (including butterflies and moths), and vegetative surveys.

B.15.1 The Nature Conservancy Butterflies and Moths (1994 - 1995)

Methods. Butterflies collected in 1994 and 1995 were obtained by sight or collection using an insect net. A minimum number of voucher specimens were collected for verification and educational purposes. Day-flying moths were collected by net during 1994 and 1995. Night-flying moths were attracted to collecting areas using mercury vapor or black lights in 1995. Sessions were scheduled from mid-May into early November 1995. An emphasis was placed on species that fly between dusk and 1 a.m. Pacific Daylight Time. Detailed collection procedures are in Soll et al. (1999).

B.15.2 TNC Bird Surveys (1994 - 1995)

Methods. Point count sampling techniques were used to count birds on the Fitzner-Eberhardt Arid Lands Ecology Reserve (ALE) and on central Hanford in 1994 and 1995. Ten-minute point counts were taken at marked locations in the early morning. Species, date, and number of birds observed were reported. Surveys were conducted between January 1 and November 30. Detail procedures are in Soll et al. (1999).

B.15.3 The Nature Conservancy Bat Surveys (1997 - 1998)

Methods. Automated ultrasonic detectors, direct capture traps and auditory-visual surveys were used to inventory bat species occurrence across the Hanford Site in 1997 and 1998. Detailed procedures are available in Soll et al. (1999).

B.15.4 The Nature Conservancy Small Mammal Surveys (1997-1998)

Methods. Sixty-eight sites were surveyed for small mammals using a variety of traps including snap trap transects in 1997 and pitfall, Sherman, and Tomahawk grids and transects in 1998. Much of the sampling was in central Hanford. Detailed procedures are available in Soll et al. (1999).

B.16 Biological Resource and Uptake of Contaminants at the 300-FF-5 Operable Units (avian and small mammal surveys)

Objective. The 300-FF-5 Operable Unit is the groundwater unit beneath the 300 Area. The objective of this investigation was to analyze the contaminant concentrations in vegetation growing in the riparian and aquatic environments and in the animals that fed or lived in the contaminated areas.

Methods. Small mammals were collected in 1991 and 1992 using Sherman live traps at three sites: an upriver control site, within the 300 Area waste disposal site, and near the 300 Area water intake.

B.17 Survey of Radiological and Chemical Contaminants in the Near Shore Environment at the Hanford Site 300 Area

Objective. Past operations at the Hanford Site have resulted in the release of radiological and chemical contamination along the Columbia River shoreline. The objective of this assessment was to identify any contamination present at the 300 Area and determine if there was a risk to humans and plant and animal life.

Methods. In 2001, sample sites were located upriver of the 300 Area (control site near Vernita Bridge) and at nine locations along the 300 Area shoreline in the vicinity of four riverbank springs. Biotic samples were collected using a variety of techniques. Small mammals were collected using Sherman live traps, sculpin were collected along the shoreline using electrofishing, while crayfish were hand-netted at each site. Asiatic clams were collected at riverbank springs and along transects perpendicular to the shoreline at four depths. Vegetation (riparian and aquatic) and periphyton were sampled at each location. Adult mayflies and darkling beetles were also collected from each sample location. Details are available in Patton et al. (2002). Sample data for small mammals are part of the SESP database.

B.18 100 B/C Area Ecological Risk Assessment Sampling and Analysis Plan

Objective. Baseline data will be used to evaluate the effectiveness of remedial action projects in the 100-B/C Area of the Hanford Site. The biota were sampled in three areas: upland, riverine, and near shore.

Methods. Sample methods included pitfall traps for invertebrates, live traps on a transect for small mammals, and electrofishing for fish. Plants were also collected at each sample location. The rationale for sample locations is in DOE (2003). Biotic sampling procedures are in PNNL (2000) and Patton et al. (2002).
